Dear Dr. Susanto,

Thank you very much for your recent email. Please accept my apologies for this late reply.

I have been recently appointed as the new editor of WWOP. I would like to advise that your article has now been assigned to a reviewer.

Unfortunately, because of some technical issues, ScholarOne is still not showing this change of status. The technical team are working on it, therefore - hopefully - the system will be updated soon. I do apologise for this inconvenience.

Thank you very much for contacting me. Please do not hesitate to contact me again, should you require further clarifications.

Dear Dr. Susanto,

Thank you very much for contacting me regarding your manuscript.

I have been recently appointed the new editor and of the journal and, as I'm taking over from my predecessor, the normal editorial process has temporarily slowed down.

However, I'd like to reassure you that your article is being reviewed, although the process is - like I said - currently slower than it would normally be.

Unfortunately - because of technical problems - the system did not alert you to this fact. I do apologise about this.

Please do not hesitate to contact me again, should you need further clarifications.

Yours sincerely,

Simone Bacchini

Dear Dr Susanto,

I hope this email finds you well. By now, you should probably have been informed that your article has been accepted for publication, with only minor revisions recommended.

As the revision are only about linguistic points (and minor ones at that), in order to speed up the publication proces, I'd be happy to edit the manuscript.

You would have to send it to me as a Word document. I would then amend it with track changes and send it back to you for your final appoval. And if you find it acceptable, you would then have to resubmit the final version using ScholarOne.

Would this be agreeable to you?

I'm looking forward to hearing from you.

Yours sincerely,
